National Water Week 2011 – ‘Healthy Catchments, Healthy Communities’

14 October 2011

National Water Week 2011 being held next week, 16 - 21 October 2011, is the premier community water awareness event in Australia, hosted by the Australian Water Association (AWA).

This year's theme – Healthy Catchments, Healthy Communities – will provide a platform for schools and communities to get involved in raising awareness about water issues. Also, as part of National Water Week, water professionals who are members of AWA are volunteering their time to engage and inspire students about catchment health. This year, over 130 ambassadors have signed up to visit schools across Australia.

There are numerous events being held in Victoria including:

- Camel in the Catchment

Trek along with Matilda the camel through the Goulburn Broken Catchment to highlight the importance of water in our region.

- Charity Golf Day

Enjoy a sausage sizzle and a game of golf at the 13th WIOA Charity Golf Day, held at the Garfield Golf Course.

- Water Treatment Plant Tour and Breakfast

Enjoy an egg and bacon muffin before touring your local water treatment plant.

Mr Tom Mollenkopf, Chief Executive of AWA said that this week is important in raising public awareness and understanding of water issues in Australia, particularly in regards to catchment management.

“The ways in which we live and work with these catchments have an impact on the quality of water that flows into these waterways. Poor management practices on land can lead to deterioration in water quality. Poor water quality is damaging to the natural environment and increases the level of treatment that our water requires.

“National Water Week is a great opportunity for students and communities to look at what they can do to minimise water consumption in their local area, securing our water for generations to come”, said Mr Mollenkopf.
